Guest Director's Corner

"This swift and furious people, the most original, inventive, unpredictable people in the world." That was how Carl Sandburg described Americans, the people he loved and honored throughout his lifetime. Though not a native American, he felt at home here – at home in Chicago, with its roaring machinery and soot-laden air, at home on a reservation of Cherokee with their beautifully basic approach to living, and at home on an Ohio farm, where nature is constantly breath-taking. He delighted in awe-struck children, blue-collared adults and reminiscing elders. He sought anything that wasn't sterile or stainless steel. Most of all, Sandburg loved the American Spirit, raw and struggling and bursting at her seams. He constantly uplifted that spirit by showing through his poetry that America derives her sustenance from never-failing hope.

The World of Carl Sandburg brings to the stage selections from ten of Sandburg's major works, including The People, Yes, Always the Young Strangers and The American Songbag. They show the basic uncluttered, incessantly hopeful lifeblood that was and is the foundation of our country. Through the media of speech, music, dance and stage actions, we present characters, emotions and memories that have made Sandburg a founding father in American poetry. We bring you no set time, no set people, no set age – only the ever-applicable Sandburg.

Director's Corner

OUR OWN THING!

In an age in which we tend to identify "your own thing" as a phrase which connotes young people indulging in activities with which members of the older generation may not be sympathetic, and particularly when we think of the activities of many luminaries of the theatrical world or of some productions currently gracing the Broadway and Off-Broadway stage, it is refreshing to consider the activities of Otterbein theatre students.

The Otterbein College Theatre has consistently followed the practice of encouraging students interested in college teaching or professional theatre to undertake the direction or design of major theatre productions as part of their regular college work. Several major productions have been presented in recent years as Distinction Projects or specific departmental projects. Some recent examples include John Soliday (Ph.D. candidate at the University of Minnesota), Dr. Jack Wright (Public Relations and theatre teacher at the University of Texas), Greg Sabatino (Advertising Agency in Dayton) and Linda Grznar (theatre graduate student at Ohio University).

Three students have functioned in major capacities this season. Glenn Plum designed and executed settings for the Children's Theatre production of The Prince and the Pauper. Incidentally, Glenn plans to enter the ministry, specializing in educational activities with young people. For this production Teri Hiatt and Mark Peters have worked closely together for several months in achieving the directorial and design concepts on view for you tonight. Teri intends to pursue a career in professional theatre, hopefully as a dancer-choreographer. Mark hopes to work with a professional lighting company next summer, followed by some teaching and graduate school. All three students have shown remarkable evidences of creativity, maturity, leadership, responsibility and academic excellence in this work. In this instance doing their "own thing" has resulted in constructive contributions to themselves, to the academic community and public at large.

I am often angered by the negative connotations of "doing your own thing," probably because we at Otterbein are surrounded by positive evidences of the constructive contributions achieved by our own students. Frankly, as time goes by we hope to provide increasing opportunity for our growing number of speech and theatre majors (now nearly 100 students) to do their "own thing." They thrive on responsibility if encouraged and given freedom to function with helpful supervision. The students who are responsible for this production have had very little direct supervision — discussion, questions and some occasional suggestions, yes, but what you are seeing is the product of their own vision based upon their ability, creativity and training.

Our students are taught that the theatre artist has a great responsibility, not only to himself, but to his co-workers (no actor could ever function without the invaluable assistance of off-stage technicians who construct and paint scenery or provide lighting so he can be seen), to the playwright (honest interpretation and communication of his words to an audience), and to the audience (whose time and money he accepts). Whether it be in a course in theatre history, drama, stagecraft, lighting, acting, directing, etc., we always strive for an understanding that quality is paramount if an audience is to experience the theatre fully. Art must hold the mirror up to nature; it must reflect the nature of man with purpose. Classical philosophers believed that the theatre should hold the best of man up for emulation (tragedy), or expose the worst of man so that we might learn from our folly (comedy).

In this instance we are proud to have you participate in a performance which reveals the talents of many students, supervised by advanced fellow students, all happily and constructively doing their "own thing."
